This is the first work-in-progress report of Dr Mansourian’s exploratory and qualitative research project investigating how people seek, use and share information in the context of casual and serious leisure. The study also explores how people evaluate the value and significance of information resources in this context.

During the past decades, research in the area of information behaviour has mainly focused on the work-related, professional or educational settings. However, in recent years a number of scholars realized we need to broaden our horizon and include other contexts. Therefore, they began exploring new grounds such as everyday life information seeking (ELIS) and serious leisure. They focused on information users who are involved in various forms of non-work activities such as amateurism, volunteering, and hobbies. In the current study, Dr Mansourian will use their findings as a theoretical framework.
